PART 1
STUDYING THE CURRICULUM
OF ‘RELIGION’ AS SOCIAL PRACTICE .......................................................... 9

1. Prologue: The desire for knowledge of ‘the Muslim pupil’:
a problematization of a problematization .................................................. 9

1.1 Gülser in the mosque and the church.
The knowledge desire of the researcher .................................................. 11

1.2 September 12: Monoculturalism, multiculturalism, and anti-racism in education? ................................................................. 14

1.3 The main questions, the object, the data ....................................... 16

1.4 From dissertation to book – from Danish into English: Studies of Danish schooling in an international context ........................................ 17

1.5 The structure of the book ................................................................. 19

2. The approach to curriculum, knowledge, and the classroom .......... 21

2.1 The understanding of curriculum in relation to research on education .... 21

2.2 Recontextualizing, pedagogizing, and the pedagogic device .............. 23

2.3 Forms of curricular knowledge conceptualized sociologically and social-epistemologically ......................................................... 26

2.4 Top-down or micro-politics? Locating curriculum through the concept of recontextualizing ....................................................... 28

2.5 Recontextualizing knowledge about ‘religion,’ ‘culture,’ and ‘identity’ – an initial localization as a framework for asking questions in the classroom . 30

2.6 The emergence of ‘the immigrant pupil’ .......................................... 32

2.7 Research on religion in schools and its impact on this study ................ 34

2.8 ‘Religion’/‘culture’ as knowledge and identity politics ...................... 36

3. Conceptual architecture: recontextualizing and the pedagogic field of practice studied as discursive regularity and social economy .... 38

3.1 Operationalizing the Bernsteinian understanding of field and discourse ............................................................................................. 38

3.2 Pedagogic discourse and discursive regularity .................................. 40

3.3 The grammar of the classroom: language as social practice ............. 42

3.4 Classroom as social space: positioning and dispositions of the agents 44

3.5 Forms of capital: The economy of the symbolic – the symbolism of economy ........................................................................ 45

3.6 Conceptualizing the classroom: social classification and knowledge .... 47

4. Two classrooms in the socioeconomic landscape. Constructing the empirical material .................................................................... 48

4.1 Constructing the data – constructing the classroom ....................... 48

4.2 The official text of the classroom ..................................................... 55
PART 2
DIFFERENTIATED ‘MUSLIM’ CLASS STRUCTURE .........................68
5. The teacher articulation of the official classroom text ..................69
  5.1 A differentiated ideal of respect ...........................................69
  5.2 ‘The Muslim pupil’ as a structuring figure ..............................71
  5.3 Separate and stable, yet flexibly changeable ..........................72
6. Muslimness as differentiated school capital ..................................74
  6.1 Culture as religion, religion as culture in the teacher’s characterizations ......75
  6.2 To be or not to be legitimate, to be or not to be ‘subject matter-relevant’ ......84
  6.3 Those in whom one can invest expectations ..................................87
  6.4 Summing up: the socioeconomic landscape ..............................92
7. Production of ‘the Muslim subjects’ ...........................................95
  7.1 Situating the text sample: educational module and lesson ................96
  7.2 Ritual as the structuring theme – Sulayman as the content ...............99
  7.3 Intimacy and distance ................................................................102
  7.4 Modality at work ......................................................................103
  7.5 Summing up: the Muslim subjects ............................................106
8. Intimization and flexibilization of acknowledged ‘Muslimness’ .............108
  8.1 Social classification: recognition of dispositions and position ..............108
  8.2 Pupils in the game of knowledge and experience ..........................110
  8.3 Categories of knowledge, production of subjects ..........................110

PART 3
SUBJECTIVITY WITHIN THE PERIMETER OF ‘MUSLIM TRADITION’: MUSLIM AS ‘LOW CLASS’ .................................112
9. The school and the teachers’ articulation of curriculum .....................113
  9.1 The educational module and the teacher speech about curriculum ..........114
  9.2 Muslims and Christians: experience knowledge and factual knowledge ....116
10. ‘Christianity’ as ‘universal human conditions’ versus the predictable ‘Muslim tradition’ ................................................................119
    10.1 The universal human funeral: organization of ‘Christianity’ and ‘funeral’ ....120
    10.2 The ‘Muslim’ tradition: organizing ‘Islam’ and ‘funeral’ .......................127
    10.3 Producing subjects, generating pupil experience ..............................136
    10.4 Summing up: constructing the objects Christianity and Islam ................139
11. The hierarchy of problematization: teachers’ interest and teachers’ concern ..........................................................143
PART 4
RELIGION AND CULTURE AS KNOWLEDGE AND SOCIAL CLASSIFICATION.................................................................172

13. Pedagogizing religion. Concluding remarks .................................................................172
   13.1 Religion as race and class .........................................................................................172
   13.2 Religion as ‘experience knowledge’ .........................................................................174
   13.3 The differentiated Muslim class structure at the B-school: the Muslim subjects ..........175
   13.4 Subjectivity within the perimeter of ‘Muslim tradition.’ The Muslim underclass at the C-schools highly differentiated class structure ........................................177
   13.5 Recapitulation: production of knowledge and production of social classification as interlinked .................................................................178
   13.6 The school’s production and classification of knowledge and bodies. ‘Muslimness’ and ‘universal Danish Christianity’ pedagogized ........................................179

References .........................................................................................................................................................181

Legislation and other documents ..............................................................................................................191

Appendix A: The B-school, selected text sample. Original Danish version .........................................................................................193
Appendix B: The C-school, selected text samples, original Danish version .................................................................195
   Text sample 1 (TRT1-6) .................................................................................................................195
   Text sample 2 (TRT1-6) .................................................................................................................196
   Text sample 3 ........................................................................................................................................197