

Language policy in a monolingual society

A self-contradiction or the reality?

Cancino, Rita

Publication date:
2011

Document Version
Early version, also known as pre-print

Link to publication from Aalborg University

Citation for published version (APA):

Cancino, R. (2011). Language policy in a monolingual society: A self-contradiction or the reality?. Abstract from the 16th AILA World Congress on Applied Linguistics 2011 , Beijing, China.

General rights

Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the public portal are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

- Users may download and print one copy of any publication from the public portal for the purpose of private study or research.
- You may not further distribute the material or use it for any profit-making activity or commercial gain
- You may freely distribute the URL identifying the publication in the public portal -

Take down policy

If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us at vbn@aub.aau.dk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Language in Societies

Language policy in a monolingual society: A self-contradiction or the reality?

Multilingualism and plurilingualism at Danish universities equal to English: What about Danish and the other languages?

The European Union recognise the importance of acquisition of foreign language competencies and intercultural knowledge. In 2003, a new Danish University Law was introduced with the strengthening of the internationalisation as one of the main purposes. Since then things have changed more rapidly than expected at Danish Universities. A massive transition to English as language of instruction has taken place in many study programmes. The English studies attract large amounts of students while foreign languages as German and French are suffering from loss of students and money.

In scientific literature English also has taken over as most Danish researchers have to present their results in English with the subsequent loss of terminology in Danish. The Danish Government has recommended that Danish, in order not to loose domain, should be used side by side with English. The universities have to preserve Danish as language of instruction, but English as medium of instruction is equal to internationalisation, foreign students and money.

Most Danish universities present themselves as “international” universities, others see themselves as multilingual, but many of them are only universities teaching in English. According to official recommendations they have to formulate a language policy.

In this paper I will discuss the complexity of problems concerning the language policies of the Danish international, multilingual or plurilingual universities.