The majority of my teaching is directly related to my research field. I highly value this coupling of research and teaching as it provides good synergy.

Basically, it is my desire as a teacher and supervisor to help facilitate a learning environment that motivates students to explore their research areas and support their journey of knowledge formation and education. It is my experience that the creation of a dynamic learning environment is based on students' experiences and the active involvement of these in the teaching and guidance. Therefore, I have a participant-oriented approach to teaching, which arises from my background in teaching and which is also closely related to my field of research and approaches to research.

I have a strong background in PBL being educated and starting my academic career at the two Problem Based Learning universities in Denmark. Now teaching first year students PBL, finalising a PBL project and contributing to developing PBL at universities in South East Asia, places the PBL as a central approach in my teaching. In my point of view PBL is much more than applying different teaching methods like. In particular, there are three concepts that guides me when I plan and conduct my teaching. This is active learning, experience (Dewey 1963) and the exemplary principle (Negt 1997) adding a relevant societal focus by coupling student's experiences to current societal issues. These ideals facilitate a participatory learning environment having the traditional plenary lessons supplemented or re-organized with student reflexive learning processes and active participation.
