Tanker om undervisningsformen på Aalborg Universitet, der har et stort indhold af gruppeorganiseret projektarbejde og problembaseret læring (PBL).

In the past 20+ years, I have had the opportunity to teach courses for various design, business and management schools. Examples of courses I taught and co-taught are: strategy and business in services, service design, data visualization, computing infrastructure management, organizational and technological trends in service design, design anthropology, design research, user experience design (design methods for ideation, prototyping and user testing), interaction design (theory and methods), design for entrepreneurship (business modelling, running a design business), design management, design and foresight. For my teaching, I have experimented with a variety of formats, including face-to-face and online lecture-based teaching, flipped classrooms, workshops (1 day to 2 weeks), prototyping hackathons, design jams, group and individual supervising, coaching and mentoring. These experiences are tied together by the notion of design-based learning, introduced by Maggi Savin-Baden (2014) while reviewing a variety of applications of PBL (problem-based learning). Like other applications of PBL (Barrows & Tamblyn, 1980; Boud, 1985; Walton & Matthews, 1989), design-based learning is an interdisciplinary and group-based learning activity in which students explore a complex, real-world problem situation, examine potential gaps in their knowledge and skills and assess what information they need to acquire through self-directed learning to address the problem (de Graaf & Kolmos, 2003; Savin-Baden & Major, 2004). However, the specific aspect of design-based learning is that it is particularly geared to engage students in activities such as the creation of artifacts, products or services at various stages of development. In this form of PBL, it is important that the design problem is realistic “so that the capabilities students learn will be transferable to the world of work; thus, the learning process in this constellation is seen as being one that strongly mirrors professional practice” (Savin-Baden, 2014, p. 206). Although this notion of design-based learning is the red thread that connects all my teaching so far, I believe much more can be explored and researched concerning formats and modalities to teach design-based learning. As such, I consider this an important area for my personal development as a teacher.
