I love teaching. Figuring out how to express complex subjects in a simple to understand manner is one of my favorite puzzles to solve - from explaining board game rules to my friends, to competing in AAU Science Slam (and winning), to designing full university level courses, the intellectual challenge is fantastic.

I do my very best to meet the students where they are and often adjust courses as they run in order to give the students the best possible experience.

I am a staunch believer in mini-projects, as I think the only way you really learn is by applying your skills. Designing a good mini-project is an art form, and while I don't always hit, I am very happy with my current 3rd semester image processing mini-project on board game analysis. An important point from this is doing mini-projects in 2-person groups: Being 2 people allows for good discussion and brainstorming, while ensuring that nobody can "hide" in a group. This works great and has received very good feedback from students.

I am dedicated to improving my teaching, and apart from soliciting feedback from students as courses progress, I always ask my students to evaluate my teaching in an anonymous questionnaire at the end of a course to collect as much data as possible on my performance.
